I'm working on a project where I'm using strchr to check for a prefix. I can't figure out why it's only returning the first match of the prefix I'm looking for. I have also tried strstr, but it gave the same result: char *start = "start test"; char *end = "end"; char *prefix = "test"; char *result = strchr(start, prefix); printf("%s", result); The output should be: test test but is: test A: '\0' is the end of string literal. So, in case you did not see '\0' in the original value of string literal, then when you do the comparison, it will end before '\0'. So, you need to add this extra character explicitly, to compare each character instead of whole string. char prefix[]="test"; char start[]="start test"; char end[]="end"; char *result = strchr(start, prefix); //Add a character '\0' to end of string literal //result = strchr(start, prefix) + 1; printf("%s
